ABDUL AZIZ IBN SAUD

Self-Made Sheikh Built Vast Arabian Kingdom

Jerusalem Post Correspondent
ABDUL AZIZ IBN SAUD was the world's most notable example of a self-made man. Starting empty-handed he conquered and organized in his lifetime the vast Arabian kingdom to which he gave his family name.

His forebears of the House of Saud conquered Arabia in the 18th century as the strong arm of a puritan crusade preached by the religious reformer Abdul Wahab, and the name Wahabite is sometimes given to the Saudi dynasty. In the 19th century they lost all their gains at the hands of Egypt and then of the rival family of Rashid. The Saud who was born in 1880, spent his youth as a landless refugee at the court of Kuwait, now a flourishing oil kingdom on the Persian Gulf.

In 1901 he brought off the stroke of genius that was the start of his great career. Thanks to good intelligence, swift riding, and surprise, he was able in a night to capture and drive back from the Rashids the town of Riyadh, capital of Nejd and of the ancestral lands of his family. He began the gradual and steady gain of territory he was never to relinquish.

Like every Arab empire-builder he derived his force from religious enthusiasm. He combined with it great practical qualities. With a vision remarkable in one who had never been outside nomad Arabia he saw that the surest future lay in settling the Beduin on the land and curbing their customs of movement and feud. Probably the most fundamental of his many reforms was the institution in 1910 of the part religious, part military and part agricultural brotherhoods which he settled in colonies all over the country and to which he gave religious and agricultural teaching in return for certain military services.

By June 1914 he had conquered territory up to the Persian Gulf. But the War Cabinet of 1914 was a slump for his advice. When it began to plan the famous Arab revolt against the Turks it tied two strings together. The British Office working from westward from the Persian Gulf sent Captain Shakespear to Ibn Saud's Nejd.

Lawrence and Hussein
The Foreign Office, working eastward from the Red Sea, sent T.E. Lawrence to King Hussein of the Hejaz, and the accidental bullet which killed Captain Shakespear in a tribal skirmish helped to decide London in favour of Lawrence's man. The large sum of £200,000 monthly, paid in gold, was handed to King Hussein whereas Ibn Saud's neutrality was purchased at the smaller fee of £5,000 a month. The Arab revolt was successful but in the long run proved a disaster for the British. Hussein had fled and the Saudis were rulers of Mecca.

Inland Nejd had presented him with internal problems only. The Hejaz and Mecca to which the faithful from all over Islam make annual pilgrimages, brought him many international complications. Many Moslems were averse to Wahabism and regarded the seizure of Mecca as an impiety. It took all his diplomacy and capacity for living things down to convince his co-religionists that he was a satisfactory trustee for his Holy Places.

Though the two territories of Hejaz and Nejd are today one kingdom, the difference between them is still marked by differing constitutions. In Nejd, the patriarchal power of the Saudis is absolute. It has date been administered by the King's eldest son, now King Saud. The Hejaz was by contrast governed through a local council of State, the son who administered it, the Emir Feisal, was also the King's Foreign Minister.

Others of the royal family, born to him by his four wives, have been fulfilling lesser offices.

Dreams of the Caliphate
Ibn Saud's ambitions had always extended beyond his own borders to dreams of the Caliphate. He made no secret of his manoeuvres within the Arab League, and the Hashemites expelled in 1924 remained his implacable enemies. At the outbreak of the Palestine war, Ibn Saud offered troops and money (to fight with the Egyptians) and was visited by the late King Abdullah and a cautious agreement was reached with regard to the attack on Palestine, although Ibn Saud was in a dilemma because of his American connections. He eventually sent only a token force to the battlefield, but continued to lead the call for a boycott of Israel.

Abdullah had visited Saudi in 1919 at the head of his father Hussein's invading army, which was caught asleep in its tents at Turaif and massacred by the Wahabites. Abdullah escaped in his night shirt. The expulsion of Hussein from Mecca and the destruction of the Hashemite dynasty was the result of a long and bitter struggle.

Roosevelt and Ibn Saud at their famous 1945 Egyptian meeting on a U.S. warship. It was here that Roosevelt allegedly promised Ibn Saud to oppose Zionism in return for a renewed flow of Arabian oil.

The Emir Feisal, second son and Saudi's Foreign Minister.

of the Kingdom of Hejaz was the beginning of an offensive Saudi move to wage in 1932, after offering to play banker to Syria, he withheld a loan because Shihabiyah refused to move from Jordan's outer from the Arab League. This latter campaign dated back to Ibn Saud's 1946 call on Farouk when the Caliphate was first mooted.

Ibn Saud's claim to the Caliphate was the strongest in the Arab world. His personality, character, and the immense wealth derived from ARAMCO, recently brought over Farouk's successor to Riyadh with plans for greater Arabia. Nagib's ostensible pilgrimage to Mecca seemed ironically to take up where Ibn Saud and Farouk had left off.

He was of course the key to the halcyon years of Ibn Saud's rule. In 1933 he granted a concession to the Standard Oil Company of California, which was later joined by the Texas Company and the Foreign Oil Company (New Jersey) and Socony Vacuum.

Oil production began in 1936 when 2,600 metric tons were produced. The million-ton mark was not reached until 1944 but in 1949 it reached over 23m. metric tons. The spectacular increase meant that a ruler who in 1917 had a total revenue of about £100,000 had in 1949 no less than £100 million.

Still Underdeveloped
Nevertheless the opportunities of developing Arabia were never realized. The port of an impious, it took all his diplomacy and capacity for living things down to convince his co-religionists that he was a satisfactory trustee for his Holy Places.

LIFE IN ARABIA

Foreigners in Arabia may not build churches for their own use. They may not be married. No alcoholic beverages may be imported, not even beer and wine. Even for foreign residents.

The words "dink," "bridge" and "demon" are forbidden, although these social activities are carried on under other names. Mixed swimming parties on the Jeddah beaches are forbidden.

Traffic penalties are so severe that Arabia's seven U.S. lawyers and a staff of "government relations" men spend most of their time trying to settle them. A 50 m.p.h. speed limit is rigidly enforced even on desert roads.

Anyone desiring to cross 12 miles of water from Doha to Bahrain for a weekend must pay a head tax of $50. Recently some Americans smoking in public have had cigarettes snatched out of their mouths by Arabian police.

Any books brought in — from paper-bound "Arabian Nights" to encyclopedias — are likely to be confiscated. Americans put up with these strictures because Saudi Arabia is, after all, a holy land, and because America values its relations with the U.S. its big oil base.

Pilgrim-thronged street in Mecca, holy city and spiritual heart of Islam.

Ibn Saud's hold on the city brought Arab leaders to his court.

An impressive dignified personality, he is less suspicious of Hashemite ambitions than his father and could continue to work well together.

What were the binding forces whereby Ibn Saud in four decades united tribes once so quarrelsome and parochial? One was his devout way of life and religious leadership; another the religious toleration without which no Arab Empire has ever survived the first flush of establishment. A third was his physical stamina and capacity for hard work. He was six feet four inches tall; to the last, though he walked slightly stiffly as the result of old wounds, he was regarded as a lusty fighter and lover.

His working day would have tired anyone of less powerful physique. He was endowed with a capacity for compromise unusual in his race. This gift made him a good diplomat. It also enabled him to bring in western innovations without offending the puritanism of his Wahabi followers. He rejected only such inventions as were contrary to his religion; anything else he was ready to introduce as fast as he was able to accustom his people to it. He was a great man long before the American and British oil prospectors of the 1890's recognized that he was one of the richest oil-bearing areas of the world.

He was a great man long before the American and British oil prospectors of the 1890's recognized that he was one of the richest oil-bearing areas of the world.

He was six feet four inches tall; to the last, though he walked slightly stiffly as the result of old wounds, he was regarded as a lusty fighter and lover.

Continuing Sir Winston Churchill's War Memoirs (XIV) Ardennes Battle—Hitler's Last Offensive

A HEAVY blow now impended. Within six days a crisis burst upon us. The Allied decision to strike hard from Aachen in the north as well as through Alsace in the south had left our centre very weak. In the Ardennes, a single corps, the VIIth American, of four divisions, held a front of 75 miles. The risk was foreseen and deliberately accepted, but the consequences were grave, and might have been graver.

By a remarkable feat the enemy gathered about 70 divisions on their Western Front, of which 15 were armoured. Many were under strength and needed rest and re-equipment, but one formation, the Sixth Panzer Army, was known to be strong and in good fettle.

The Germans had indeed a major plan. Rundstedt assembled two Panzer armies, the Fifth and the Seventh, and the Seventh Army, a total of ten Panzer and 14 infantry divisions. This great force, led by its armour, was intended to break through our western defences, swing round the river Meuse, swing north-west, cut the Allied line in two, seize the port of Antwerp, and sever the lifeline of our northern armies.

This bold bid was planned by Hitler, who would brook no changes in it on the part of his doubting generals. In its support the remnants of the German Air Force were assembled for a final effort, while para-troops, saboteurs, and agents in Allied uniforms were all given parts to play.

The attack began on Dec. 16 under a heavy artillery barrage. At its northern flank the Sixth Panzer Army ran into the right of the First U.S. Army, the Allied High Command, its importance and purpose were quickly recognized. They resolved to strengthen the "shoulder" of the breakthrough, hold the Meuse crossing both east and south of Namur, and mass mobile troops to crush the salient from north and south.

Eisenhower's Action
Eisenhower acted speedily. He stopped all Allied attacks in progress and brought up four American divisions from reserve, of six from the First Army and two from the Second Army. One of them the 6th British, came from England.

North of the salient the British XXXth Corps, of four divisions, which had just come out of the line on the river Roer, was concentrated between Liege and Louvain behind the American First and Ninth Armies. These latter threw in all their reserves to extend a defensive flank westwards from Malmédy.

By severing the front of Gen. Bradley's 12th Army Group the Germans had made it impossible for him to exercise effective command over his headquarters in Luxembourg over his two armies north of the bulge. Gen. Eisenhower therefore very wisely placed Montgomery in temporary command of all Allied troops in the north, while Bradley retained the Third U.S. Army and was charged with holding and counter-attacking the enemy from the south. Corresponding arrangements were made for the tactical air forces.

(A telegram to Field-Marshal Brooke from the Prime Minister shows that he suggested this to Gen. Eisenhower on Dec. 16, but that the Supreme Commander had issued such orders "before sunrise.")

Three of our reinforcing divisions, and the Meuse south of Namur, Bradley concentrated a corps at Arlon and sent the American 10th Airborne Division to secure the important road junctions at Bastogne. The German armour swung north of Bastogne and sought to break

Bastogne and the Yalta Concessions

LONDON, (NANA) — The Yalta concessions to Russia would never have been made had not Hitler's attack at Bastogne, which the Battle of the Bulge put the Allies on the defensive in the Ardennes, according to an approved military history of the liberation of Europe just published by the State Records Office, London.

The author, Major John North, a former British General Staff Officer, bases his facts on official records in London and Washington.

Although the German attack on the Battle of the Bulge, Major North relates that on January 7, 1945, the British Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, called Marshal Stalin that the position in the West was "very serious" and asked for a quick offensive by the Red Army to relieve the pressure. Marshal Stalin agreed to have the Red Army attack on January 12, Churchill then wrote to Stalin thanking him from the bottom of his heart.

The result of this offensive was that when the Yalta conference was held on February 4, 1945, "Marshal Stalin was less than 40 miles from the eastern border of Berlin."

Thus the British and American representatives went to Yalta with a deep sense of gratitude to the Russians, and their hands were tied accordingly.

The author also points out that while the Russians had their way northwards, leaving their infantry to capture the town, the 101st, with some armoured units, were isolated, and for a week beat off all attacks.

The wheel of the Fifth and Sixth Panzer Armies produced a bitter fighting around Bastogne, which lasted till Dec. 26. By then the Germans were exhausted, although at one time they were only four miles from the Meuse and had penetrated over 80 miles. Bad weather and low ground fog had kept our forces out of the first week of the battle, but on Dec. 23 flying conditions got better and they intervened with tremendous effect.

Unleashed their foremost objective, the Meuse, the Panzers turned savagely on Bastogne. The American 101st Division had been reinforced on Dec. 26 by part of the 4th U.S. Army, and although the town grimly for another week. Before the end of December the German High Command must have realized, however unwillingly, that the battle was lost, for Patton's counter-offensive from Arlon, which started on Dec. 22, so steadily if slowly progressing over the snow-covered countryside towards Houffalize.

Last Bid
The enemy made one last bid, this time in the air. On Jan. 1 they made a violent low-level surprise attack on all our forward airfields. Our losses were heavy, though promptly replaced, but the Luftwaffe lost more than they could afford in their final massed attack of the war.

On Jan. 3 Montgomery launched his northern counter-offensive against Houffalize to join Patton's attack from the south.

At this time Eisenhower and his staff were of course acutely anxious to know whether the Russians could do anything from their side to take off some of the pressure against us in the West. All efforts through the liaison officers in Moscow had failed to obtain any reply from their opposite numbers.

As soon as I heard of this I said to Eisenhower: "You may find many delays on the staff level, but I expect Stalin would tell me if I asked him. Shall I try?" He asked me to do so.

When one considers how serious was the decision asked for and how many people were involved, it is remarkable that the answer should have been sent me the very next day.

Marshal Stalin to Prime Minister

"We are preparing an offensive, but the weather is at present unfavourable. Nevertheless taking into account the position of our Allies on the Western Front, G.H.Q. of the Supreme Command has decided to accelerate the completion of our preparations, and, regardless of the weather, to commence large-scale offensive operations against the Germans along the whole Central Front not later than the second half of January. You may rest assured that we shall do everything possible to render assistance in the glorious success of our Allies."

Prime Minister to Marshal Stalin

"I am most grateful to you for your thrilling message. I have sent it over to Gen. Eisenhower for his eyes only. May all good rest upon your noble venture."

I quote this interchange as a good example of the speed at which business was done at the summit of the Alliance, and also because it was a fine deed of the Russians and their chief to hasten their war, and no doubt at a heavy cost in life.

Struggling through snowstorms, the two wings of the Allied attack slowly drew closer, until they met at Houffalize on Jan. 16. The Germans were forced steadily eastwards and harassed continually from all flanks, until by the end of the month they were back behind their frontier, with nothing to show for their supreme effort except ruinous losses of material and casualties amounting to 120,000 men.

One awkward situation during the battle must be recorded, although happily it did not affect the issue. In order to release divisions from the Third Army, Eisenhower had ordered Devere's Sixth Army Group to take over part of Patton's front, and authorized, if necessary, withdrawal from the Rhine to the Vosges. This meant leaving Strasbourg open to the enemy.

French Anxiety

There was understandable consternation in French political and military circles. What vengeance would fall upon the citizens of Strasbourg who had rallied so passionately to their deliverers? I chanced to be at Eisenhower's headquarters at St. Germain's at this juncture, and he and Bedell Smith listened attentively to my appeal.

The enemy did, indeed spring into action on the Army Group's front, especially in the Colmar pocket, but were repulsed, Eisenhower cancelled his instructions, and the military necessity which might have made the evacuation of Strasbourg imperative never arose. De Gaulle expressed his gratitude.

This was the enemy's final offensive of the war. At the time it caused us no little anxiety. Our own advance had to be postponed, but we benefited in the end. The Germans could not replace their losses, and our subsequent battles on the Rhine, though severe, were undoubtedly eased. The German High Command, and even Hitler, must have been disillusioned. Taken by surprise, Eisenhower and his commanders acted swiftly, but they will agree that the major credit lies elsewhere.

In Montgomery's words, the Battle of the Ardennes was won primarily by the staunch fighting qualities of the American soldier."
